Read the passage carefully and answer the following questions. (Do not copy the passage)

Chameleons are in a class by themselves and are no ordinary reptiles. They are easily distinguished from their nearest relatives, like lizards, by certain outstanding features.

A chameleon's tongue is as long as its body. Its limbs are long and slender and its fingers and toes resemble a parrot's claws. On its head there may be any of several ornaments. Henry had a rigid crest that looked like a fireman's helmet.

Henry's eyes were his most remarkable features. They were not beautiful, but his left eye was quite independent of his right. He could move one eye without disturbing the other. Each eyeball, bulging out of his head, wobbled up and down, backward and forward. This frenzied movement gave Henry a horrible squint. And one look into Henry's frightful gaze was often enough to scare people into believing that chameleons are dangerous and poisonous reptiles.

One day, Grandfather was visiting a friend, when he came upon a noisy scene at the garden gate. Men were shouting, hurling stones, and brandishing sticks. The cause of the uproar was a chameleon that had been discovered sunning itself on a shrub. Someone claimed that the chameleon could poison people twenty feet away, simply by spitting at them. The residents of the area had risen up in arms. Grandfather was just in time save the chameleon from certain death- he brought the little reptile home.
